

The Law and Religion Scholars Network (LARSN) will be running its PhD students workshop again in the year ahead. As in previous years, most of the day will consist of work in progress papers by students working in law and religion, and the chance to meet other students in the area. If there is sufficient interest, I will also organise a more careers orientated session where you can get feedback on a mock job application to a generic UK university (were there such a thing!).

I would like to choose a date for this event which gives as many students who want to come along the chance, so will be using doodle to identify the best date.

If you, or one of your students, would like to come along to the workshop, please follow the link below to indicate days you can make. Indicate as many as possible (rather than just your preferred days), as this will give me most flexibility when trying to accommodate everyone. Please give your email as your name, as this will allow me to set up a mailing list at the same time.

Please complete the poll by 6 October. I will then finalise the date.

The workshop is open to PhD students based outside of the UK, as well as students studying the interaction of law and religion from other disciplinary perspectives. Additionally, if you are considering taking on a research degree focussing on law and religion, but are still undecided, please indicate availability on doodle, and email me separately to discuss possible attendance.

Please feel free to post on to any other lists you think relevant.
