Third Annual Graduate Conference on Religion

October 14, 2017

Do religion and healthcare operate in two distinct worlds? Might religious traditions bring insights and perspectives to health care practice, and vice versa? What are the legal and ethical dilemmas health care practitioners face when it comes to religion? How might health care and religion have different understandings of purity, illness, and cleanliness? Who has authority over a sick person's body? How should we understand and manage a disease that spreads through religious ritual? How do religious communities make sense of the Ebola epidemic? What defines the end of life and who has the power to make the decision? Should physicians take their patients' religious perspectives into account or is religion irrelevant to "doing no harm?" What role have religious communities played in providing health care now and historically?

Boston University graduate students invite you to submit paper proposals to the Fall 2017 Conference, "Going Viral: Religion and Health" to explore these and other questions like them.

Conceptions of the body
Autonomy in religion and health care
Bioethics
Purity and Cleanliness
Secular/Religious dichotomy
End of Life practice and issues
Death and Health
Moral explanations of sickness, disease, suffering, and death
Religious Freedom, policy, and law
Faith healing
Quarantine and outbreak
Women's health
Trauma and abuse

Possible topics may include, but are not limited to:

Please submit a CV and a 300-word abstract by June 30, 2017 to BUreligionconference2017@gmail.com October 14, 2017 Boston University 745 Commonwealth Ave. Boston, MA